

Marina D. Cassio

Marina D. Cassio is an associate at Marten Law, where she represents both public and private clients in litigation, permitting, and compliance matters within the areas of environmental, natural resources, and land use law. Her expertise lies especially in CEQA and environmental impact review, endangered species and habitat protection, and environmental remediation and restoration. She has helped some of the world's largest solar energy facilities secure development permits, litigated coverage and contribution claims on behalf of local governments and private property owners, and participated in the appellate representation of Indian tribes supporting endangered species regulations. Ms. Cassio previously served as a legal intern at the Center for International Environmental Law, equipping communities to understand and protect their environmental human rights in the face of global development. She earned her Juris Doctor, cum laude, from Harvard Law School. Prior to commencing her legal career, Ms. Cassio did oceanographic research on open-ocean plastic pollution with the Sea Education Association, and astrobiology research on potentially habitable planets with the NASA Goddard Institute for Space Studies.
