

David Wallace-Jackson

David Wallace-Jackson litigates complex matters in federal and state courts throughout the United States. He represents companies and individuals in complex business and intellectual property disputes, internal investigations and due diligence work, and white-collar criminal defense matters.

David has brought and defended business litigation matters for his entire career. He routinely litigates complex cases involving contract, tort, patent, trade secret and unfair competition issues. He defends companies against product liability lawsuits and related agency investigations. David advises clients on international business conduct issues as they arise under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and similar statutes, and is regularly involved in conducting due diligence and internal investigations around the world. And he routinely defends clients in white-collar criminal cases as well as guiding them through internal investigations of suspected wrongdoing.

David makes it a point to learn the technical issues of a case in a way that lets him explain complex points to an audience that does not have technical training.

David obtained his J.D. from the University of Minnesota School of Law, magna cum laude, and received his B.A., magna cum laude, from Carleton College in Political Science. He has been listed in Best Lawyers in America every year since 2013.
